Good morning, my friends!

I'm Lucius Bainbridge, your old friend. It's another sunny morning! We often habitually say "good morning" to others, but how many times have you said it to yourself? We spend so much time judging others yet rarely take a moment to reflect on ourselves. So, let's pause and ask: Is my current life truly the way I envisioned it? Am I actively working towards changing my financial situation?

AIT COMMUNITY

Life can be tough, especially when we bear family responsibilities. Stress can cause us to lose sight of the root of our problems. However, no matter how challenging life gets, the world is still full of beauty and opportunity. The key lies in who you aspire to be. Have you started making changes toward that goal?

For many normal people, investing is the most practical way to achieve the American Dream. The remarkable rally in U.S. stocks over the past decade has delivered astonishing returns to investors. If your investment returns are underwhelming or even resulting in losses, now is the time to pause and reflect: Why is this happening? We enter the stock market to make money, not lose it. So, what have you truly invested in your success? What efforts have you made to achieve it?

As I always say, success is never a coincidence. Experienced investors tend to earn more, while those with capital leverage their experience for higher returns. Beginners learn through mistakes, whereas savvy investors harness the power of professional teams to avoid pitfalls. If you feel lost regarding future investment directions and seek more guidance, I sincerely recommend you stay and listen to the insights from the many investment experts in AIT community. Here, numerous top investors have achieved success through the right choices and professional support.

I am willing to share my decades of investment experience to help you navigate your investment journey and encourage more friends to engage in philanthropy, which is the ultimate goal of AIT community. No matter the challenges ahead, as long as you don't give up, success will ultimately belong to those who persevere. Even in the darkest moments, consistent effort will surely bring light, and happiness will eventually knock on your door.

With over ten thousand publicly traded companies in U.S. stock market, investors must do more than just pick quality stocks, timing is crucial. Different times correspond to different price points, and timing is key in stock trading. For example, during the first half of this year, AI tech stocks like NVIDIA experienced explosive growth, which was the perfect moment for us to go all in or leverage our positions. Now, with indexes at high levels, most tech stocks have lost their attractiveness, and few investors dare to enter the market on a large scale or use leverage. This suggests that the peak of the 2024 stock market cycle may have come to an early end.

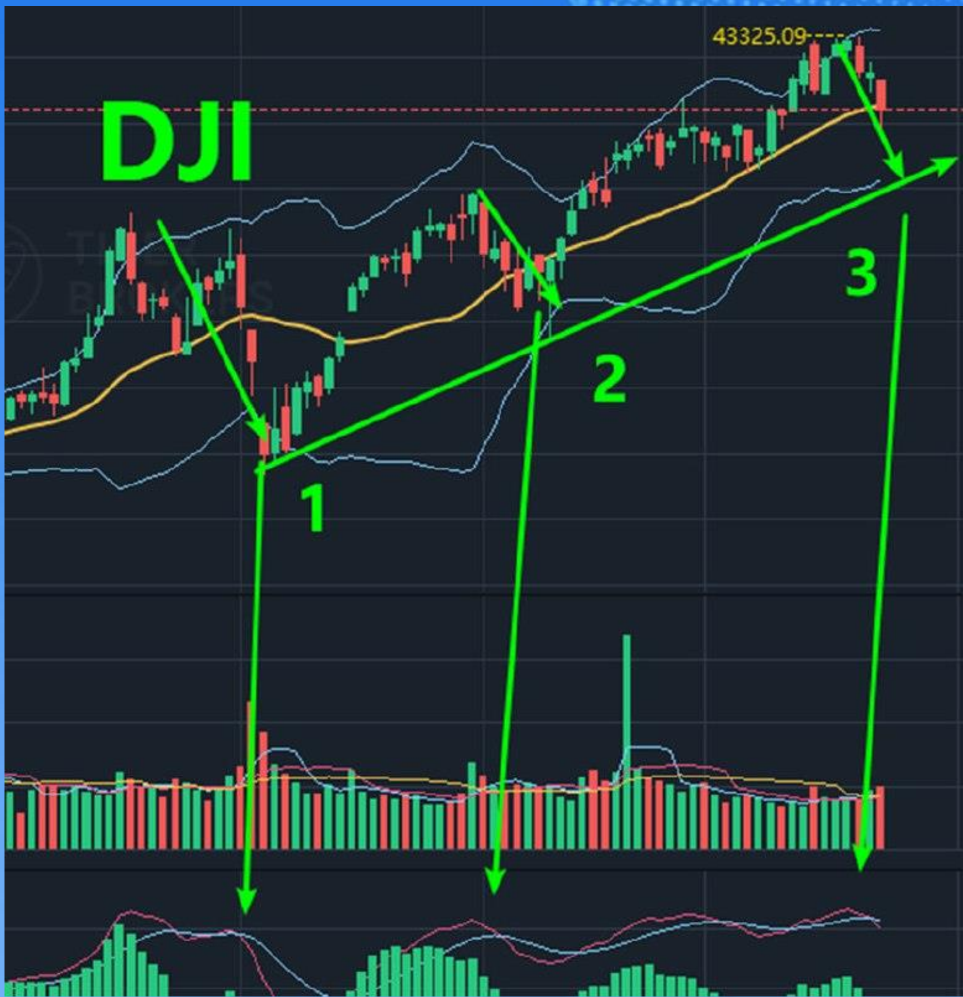
On Wednesday, U.S. stock market saw a significant decline, with the Dow Jones Industrial Average dropping nearly 400 points, marking the largest single-day drop in over a month. The primary reason was the rise in U.S. Treasury yields, which added pressure to market sentiment. Simultaneously, the market awaited a series of important earnings reports and continued to monitor the upcoming U.S. elections and Federal Reserve interest rate cuts. The Dow and S&P 500 have now declined for three consecutive days.

The yield on the 10-year U.S. Treasury note briefly surpassed 4.25%, reaching its highest point since July. Over the past month, Treasury yields have continued to rise, despite the Fed having begun cutting rates in September. Some believe that improving economic data is driving the rise in yields, while others speculate that if Donald Trump is re-elected, the fiscal deficit could widen further.

Regarding the current market volatility, analysts point out that it represents a repricing of expectations surrounding the Fed's rate cuts. The impacts of previous rate hikes have yet to be fully felt, and as rates remain high for an extended period, certain sectors of the economy will need to adjust to this new reality. High-valuation large-cap stocks, in particular, may face greater risks of correction.

The Fed's latest Beige Book report indicates that from September to early October, U.S. economic activity has remained generally stable, with increased hiring by businesses. These signs support market expectations that the Fed will cut rates by 25 basis points in two weeks. Additionally, inflationary pressures continue to ease, and economic issues remain a key concern for voters ahead of the election.



As shown in the chart above, we can clearly see from the daily candlestick chart of the Dow that each time it touches the lower Bollinger Band, it is accompanied by a death cross in the MACD at high levels. Notably, although the market tends to generate temporary adjustments each time it touches the lower Bollinger Band, each adjustment thereafter presents a buying opportunity.

With the market rallying, rate cut expectations have gradually been realized, and the pace of future cuts may slow, indicating a potential return to technical adjustments. Currently, the MACD death cross has reformed, does the touch of the lower Bollinger Band signal yet another buying opportunity? Many friends are questioning whether the market can continue to rise.

In fact, looking at the overall trend of the daily candlestick chart, the upward trend remains intact, continuing at a steady 35-degree ascent. This means that as long as the price touches the lower Bollinger Band, it remains a worthwhile buying opportunity.

Upon reviewing, we find that aside from a few stocks with positive earnings reports seeing minor increases, the market lacks sustained momentum and there is no significant upward continuity. Overall, the market's profit-generating effect has not been prominent, most activities are centered around concept stocks with poor performance, such as PUHN and DJT, which have shown relative strength while other stocks remain weak.

AIT COMMUNITY

For stocks that report earnings on the same day, opportunities for speculation have also become limited. Most stocks may rise on their earnings release day but then enter a consolidation phase. If one misjudges the direction, they could face a substantial drop that day. In this market environment, with the index showing instability, we should manage our positions wisely. For quality stocks held at the bottom, we should not hastily cut losses during market adjustments, as this could mean missing out on potential rebounds and easily falling into losses. Conversely, once the index stabilizes, it makes sense to increase positions in quality stocks, aligning with institutional thinking in trading strategies. Avoid losing patience and blindly cutting losses just because stock prices fall, which will only lead to cumulative losses and affect your mindset.

Faced with the current market correction, we should see opportunities rather than risks. As the saying goes, "Rising brings risks, falling brings opportunities." When stock prices are at a high, we should consider selling, while when the market is low, it is the best time to buy. This is the key principle for making profits in the stock market. Stay calm, adhere to long-term investment principles, and become a friend of time, this is the right path to success.

By managing positions, seizing low-point opportunities, and patiently navigating market fluctuations, you will gradually cultivate a mature investment mindset. Opportunities always favor the prepared, and market adjustments are merely a necessary path to the next rally.

Tesla has released its third-quarter earnings report, showing overall performance exceeding expectations, particularly in terms of profits. Although revenue slightly fell short of market expectations, the stock soared nearly 12% in after-hours trading, and the early morning bidding also showed robust performance.

Specifically, Tesla's third-quarter revenue reached $25.18 billion, just below the market expectation of $25.43 billion, but a significant increase compared to $23.35 billion from the same period last year. Most notably, Tesla's earnings per share were $0.72, far exceeding the market expectation of $0.60, and the gross margin hit 19.8%, above the expected 16.8%. Additionally, free cash flow reached $2.74 billion, well above the anticipated $1.61 billion. These strong figures have clearly instilled confidence in investors, propelling a rapid rise in stock price.

However, we must note that the timing of this earnings report and the technical pattern of the stock price are crucial. Currently, Tesla's stock price has undergone adjustments, and market sentiment is relatively low. This means that as long as the earnings report isn’t disappointing, the market will interpret it as positive and push the stock price higher. However, we must remain vigilant, the candlestick patterns do not show a typical mainstream upward trend. Therefore, the surge driven by the earnings report may just be a temporary reaction, and the stock price may require a technical repair phase afterward.

AIT COMMUNITY

Observing the daily candlestick chart, we can see that the major rebounds in June and September were based on the stock price stabilizing around the middle Bollinger Band, accompanied by the opening of the upper Bollinger Band, leading to strong upward trends. In contrast, the current technical patterns seem relatively weak. This rebound appears more like a corrective shake after a gap up rather than a typical trend-based rise.

From technical comparisons, we can conclude that the strength of this rebound may not be too robust. However, as long as the support level at $182 holds, the potential formation of a head-and-shoulders pattern will not occur, which is a positive sign for bulls. For us, the wisest strategy is to patiently wait for the technical patterns to improve before seeking appropriate buying opportunities. This teaches us that we shouldn't rush into chasing highs. Rather, we should wait for technical signals to confirm before making rational investment decisions. The stock market is like a marathon, opportunities will always exist, and the key is whether you are prepared to seize them.

Regarding the current market correction, I understand that many of you feel confused. The stock market experiences daily fluctuations, but lacks sustained trends. In such an environment, whether you're going long or short, the profit margins are relatively limited. When market fluctuations are smaller, holding onto stocks and waiting for prices to rise may be a more prudent strategy. Looking ahead to the remainder of 2024, the opportunities for significant gains in the three major indices appear very slim, with expectations leaning towards more consolidations and small fluctuations. Therefore, one should not hold overly high expectations for stock price increases.

However, 2024 features two key events expected to have a substantial impact on the market. First is the already occurred Bitcoin halving, which will have profound implications for the long-term performance of the crypto market. Second is the upcoming U.S. presidential election, which is also crucial for overall market trends. These two events further highlight the attractiveness of the crypto market and its strong profit potential. Therefore, I have consistently recommended a “dual-account trading strategy,” which involves simultaneously positioning in both the stock and crypto markets to better capture investment opportunities and achieve wealth growth.

The stock market provides cyclical profit opportunities that often require more patience, while the crypto market offers more short-term and medium-term trading opportunities. Recently, we capitalized on astonishing profits from Bitcoin volatility. While you were still on the sidelines, some have already realized profits amounting to hundreds of thousands or even millions of dollars through trading. This is the power of choice. The right choice often outweighs hard work. Selecting the right investment hotspots is the beginning of success.

In sharing and discussions within AIT community, I repeatedly emphasize the importance of mindset. Mindset can change behavior, and behavior determines outcomes. While sharing a few quality stocks can lead to short-term gains, it’s more important to learn how to select these stocks and capture market hotspots. Only by mastering these skills can you achieve long-term stable profitability. The essence of financial investment lies in seizing the profit cycles of various industries and profiting from them. Currently, the crypto market undoubtedly stands out as a major hotspot outside the stock market.

Compared to the stock market, the flexibility of the crypto market is evidently more attractive, which is why many investors favor it. Just yesterday, our Bitcoin trading strategy executed perfectly: we successfully shorted around $66,800, reaching our target of $65,500 and earning over $1,000 in profits. The long position strategy in the $65,500-$65,200 range also accurately achieved close to $1,000 in additional profits. As the U.S. election approaches, Bitcoin has been categorized as part of the so-called "Trump trade" due to former President Donald Trump's pro-crypto stance. The possibility of Trump returning to the White House is beginning to conflict with broader global market shifts, particularly against the backdrop of rising bond yields and a strengthening dollar. Republican candidate Trump is leading Vice President Kamala Harris in prediction markets, with widespread expectations that if he wins on November 5, it will drive further growth in the U.S. economy. As a result, investors remain cautious about the prospect of future monetary easing.

AIT COMMUNITY

Meanwhile, as financial conditions gradually tighten, volatility in both Bitcoin and the stock market has increased, with Bitcoin facing its first weekly loss in three weeks. Although Trump's campaign rhetoric has boosted sentiment in the crypto market, whether his broader economic policies will dampen this optimism remains uncertain.

Trump has promised to make the U.S. the global hub for crypto, while Harris has taken a more cautious stance, advocating for a stricter regulatory framework for the industry. The positions of these two candidates stand in sharp contrast to current President Joe Biden's crackdown on the crypto industry. The recent rise in Bitcoin has already partially priced in the current favorable news. For Bitcoin to continue its significant upward trend, more market sentiment and strong external factors will be needed to drive further breakthroughs.

From a technical perspective, the daily candlestick chart has broken above $67,480, with the bulls clearly taking the lead today. The overall trend favors buying on dips. Yesterday’s decline has successfully stabilized, aligning with our early-week expectation: we observed signs of a pullback before Wednesday, and starting in the latter half of the week, the bulls began to push the price upward.

Trading Strategy:

- Go long near $67,500, with a stop-loss set below $66,900, targeting around $69,000.
- If the price breaks above $69,000, consider shorting at this level, with a stop-loss set above $69,600 and a target around $68,000.

That's all for this morning's session. If you would like to receive more timely trading strategies, please add my assistant on Telegram. See you this afternoon, and I look forward to continuing our discussion!

1. Emotional Trading: How to Find Trading Opportunities Amid Market Sentiment Resonance and Divergence?
2. Understanding Market Sentiment Through the VIX Index to Capture More Accurate Trading Timing.
3. Crypto Market Strategy: How to Achieve Stable Profits Amid Volatility?

I'm Lucius Bainbridge, your old friend. The investment market is always full of challenges, and when we’re waiting after a brief trade, time seems especially long—especially during the current period of volatility in the U.S. stock market. However, it's during this wait that patience and discipline play a significant role. Right now, it's crucial to hold onto your positions, particularly in those quality stocks. When the right buying opportunity arises, remember that institutional thinking tells us: a reasonable entry point is far better than blindly chasing high prices.

AIT COMMUNITY

Recently, I’ve shared multiple times how to use institutional thinking and market sentiment in trading strategies. If you’ve understood and mastered these concepts, you should feel more composed when facing the current market fluctuations. The market’s volatility shouldn’t cause you to lose your direction; rather, it’s the best opportunity for us to strategically position ourselves and buy quality stocks. Patience is a powerful tool that will make time your ally, ultimately leading to substantial rewards.

So don’t let short-term market fluctuations shake your confidence. Use the strategies you’ve learned and approach the market with a calm mindset. Trust me, time will prove that your persistence today is worth it!

As shown in the chart, the Dow Jones Industrial Average (DJIA) is still experiencing a downward adjustment as expected, while the Nasdaq and S&P 500 have shown a slight rebound. Taking the DJIA as an example, this adjustment has touched the lower Bollinger Band, meaning the opportunity is very close. The market always has its own patterns; as we can see, after the MACD formed a death cross at a high level, the bears chose to gradually decline, targeting around 42,000 points. This slow adjustment is actually friendly to the market, providing a breather that effectively digests the previous gains and pressures.

In the face of such declines, institutional thinking sees opportunities, while retail investors often feel pessimistic and frustrated. If you want to survive and profit in the market in the long term and become a truly qualified investor, you must adopt institutional thinking. When the market falls, institutional investors are not swayed by emotions; instead, they calmly identify buying opportunities. This has been the focus of my recent discussions—how to build your own investment philosophy and how to interpret market fluctuations with rationality.

Every market decline creates opportunities for prepared investors, rather than instilling fear and retreat. We must remember that short-term market fluctuations do not affect long-term growth. As long as you have a strong investment philosophy and effectively utilize institutional thinking, you will ultimately reap substantial rewards in the market.

Market sentiment plays a crucial role in trading, almost dictating the direction of short-term price fluctuations. Understanding market sentiment means being able to anticipate the resonance and divergence of emotions, allowing you to identify real trading opportunities.

When market sentiment is highly uniform, it often signals that the market may have reached a critical point. When everyone is frantically chasing gains or uniformly bearish, this overly consistent sentiment actually serves as a risk signal. At this point, a reversal is often likely, as the market tends to move in the opposite direction of what most people expect. Why is that? Because the market itself does not operate according to everyone's expectations indefinitely. Once the forces of bulls or bears become too concentrated, the market can easily break this emotional consensus with a wave of counter-trend movement.

AIT COMMUNITY

Conversely, when there is a significant divergence in market sentiment, it often represents the best opportunity to engage in trading. This indicates that the market is hesitating and investors are uncertain about the future direction, which is a stage where risk and opportunity coexist. Divergence creates volatility, and volatility creates opportunities. This is what we, as investors, should focus on—analyzing these emotional divergences to identify high-probability trading opportunities.

In trading, we must remain vigilant about extreme emotions and learn to find entry points based on changes in market sentiment. Remember, emotional resonance often signals danger, while emotional divergence represents opportunity. Mastering this concept can greatly enhance our win rates in trading and help us maintain an edge in the market.

AIT COMMUNITY

We find ourselves once again at a moment filled with reflection, especially when facing stocks like Nvidia that are at historical highs. The current market sentiment is extremely uniform, with nearly all top analysts bullish on Nvidia. Goldman Sachs, Bank of America, CFRA, and even Bernstein have all raised their price targets. It seems like Nvidia's future is bright, right? But let’s take a step back; when market sentiment is too uniform, it often means we need to be more cautious.

As you know, when everyone is bullish, it can often be a warning sign of potential risks in the market. Why? Because a consensus in sentiment can lead us to overlook the fact that the stock price is already consolidating at a high level. Even though the weekly candlestick chart shows five consecutive weeks of bullish candles, the price hasn't surged significantly; instead, it has entered a consolidation phase. This is actually sending a signal— the market may be digesting all the good news, and the risk of a downward adjustment is gradually increasing. With Nvidia's current price already high, the more uniform the sentiment becomes, the greater the risk.

Friends, the core of investing lies in contrarian thinking. Selling when sentiment is unanimously bullish and buying during periods of low sentiment is the key to successful investing. When Nvidia's price targets are being raised and the market is filled with bullish sentiment, that's when we should be cautious. Don’t be fooled by the surface-level optimism; we need to recognize that the stock price is already high, and any small adjustment can present a better buying opportunity.

When everyone is optimistic, you need to stay calm. If the upcoming quarterly report exceeds expectations, there might be some short-term upside potential. However, this overly unanimous bullish outlook could easily lead to a reversal in trend. So, investing requires patience and vigilance. Do you understand Nvidia's current position? When others are all bullish, being cautious is the wise choice.

In contrast to the overwhelmingly bullish sentiment surrounding Nvidia, Tesla's situation is completely different, filled with controversy and division. Yesterday, we conducted a detailed analysis of the market's attitude toward Tesla—both bulls and bears are nearly at a stalemate. It is precisely because of this divergence in market sentiment, combined with the stock price being at a low level, that we have seen today's significant rebound in Tesla.

When a stock price is at a low level, as long as the third-quarter results aren't too terrible, the market tends to interpret this as a positive. This is one of the reasons we're seeing a rebound in Tesla today. However, friends, despite the rebound, it's unfortunate that Tesla's technical indicators and trading volume do not support a strong upward trend. At least for now, today's movement hasn't confirmed a clear upward trend. This doesn't align with our buying logic, so we haven't recommended that anyone make a purchase.

Right now, there are too many options investors participating in the earnings game for Tesla, which is one of the few bright spots. However, the sustainability of this game remains to be seen. Remember, discrepancies in market sentiment can sometimes create short-term volatility opportunities, but if there's a lack of solid technical indicators and volume support, the continuity of the trend is often difficult to grasp.

Today's performance from Tesla has given us a vivid lesson, perfectly illustrating the reversal opportunities amid emotional discrepancies. By comparing Tesla's weekly and daily candlestick charts, we can clearly see that it remains within a triangular range and has not broken the downward trend that started at $271. Although today's surge pushed the stock price above the middle band of the Bollinger Bands, the daily pattern still needs further correction.

This rebound is more of an explosion point driven by the market's emotional response to the positive earnings report after the previous sharp decline. However, until the stock price breaks through the downward trend line, we still need to maintain a cautious attitude. As we've discussed before, emotional discrepancies often lead to short-term reversal opportunities, but to truly confirm a trend change, we need more technical signal support.

As one of the "Magnificent Seven," Tesla's strong rebound today is undoubtedly a typical case of emotional divergence. But friends, emotions can only drive short-term fluctuations; real trend reversals require us to patiently observe and wait for key levels to be broken before taking action. This is the key to capturing reversal opportunities brought by emotions in a complex market.

The VIX index, also known as the "fear index," is currently holding above 18 and has been fluctuating between 14 and 23 recently. This is an indicator we need to pay close attention to. Generally, a decline in the VIX indicates reduced market volatility, suggesting that the stock market may continue to rise. Conversely, if the VIX rebounds, it signals that the three major indices could face a slight pullback.

Generally, when the VIX index is below 18, the bulls have a clear advantage in the market. However, given the current market sentiment, the bullish strength in the stock market is clearly weak. We can see from recent stock performance that most stocks are in a weak consolidation phase. Aside from a few concept stocks and those that have exceeded earnings expectations, the overall profit effect in the market is not strong.

Therefore, changes in the VIX index will be an important tool for us to assess market volatility and direction. Friends, it's crucial to stay calm at this time, closely monitor VIX fluctuations, and wait for genuine market signals before taking action. As long as we firmly grasp these key indicators and stay prepared, opportunities in the market are still waiting for us.

Friends, as shown in the image, the VIX index reached its highest value of 65.73 this year on August 5, and then began to decline. You can open your stock software to see what happened in the market that day. You'll find that many stocks hit their lows on that day and then started to rebound significantly. There are countless examples like this, especially when the three major indices stabilized, leading to a rapid market rebound.

When the VIX fear index reaches a peak, it often signals a shift in market sentiment, and this is a crucial moment we must seize. In contrast, the VIX index is currently in a sideways consolidation at the bottom, which means it could break upward at any time. This also explains the current poor profit performance in the stock market. The suppression of market sentiment limits the bullish strength and narrows the profit potential.

So, when is the right time for us to make heavy trades? It requires patient waiting. Meanwhile, the crypto market offers a perfect opportunity. Compared to the fluctuating stock market, the crypto market is vibrant, highly volatile, and full of opportunities. That's why I've always advocated for diversified investing; combining the stock market with the crypto market helps us find opportunities in various market conditions.

As shown in the chart, BTC continued its upward trend from yesterday, just as we mentioned earlier. Today's performance is crucial. If the bulls want to push further, they must maintain the uptrend today. Otherwise, if the MACD forms a death cross at the high level, it will be extremely unfavorable for the bulls. As you can see, the power of technical analysis is fully demonstrated at this moment. In the second chart, you can clearly see that the daily candlestick marked as 1 is very similar to today's, showcasing the advantage of AI-driven big data analysis.

Whether this rally can break above the downward trend line will be the key. If it fails, the bears might seize the opportunity to initiate another correction. At this point, we can analyze market sentiment: when everyone believes that Trump's return to the White House is a foregone conclusion and the optimism around Bitcoin's rise is unanimous, could the market reverse and undergo a correction? Once the correction is complete, as we anticipate, the market will likely surge again amidst differing opinions, setting a new all-time high with a target above $80,000.

If you missed the 70% profit from DJT last week or today’s 20% gain in Tesla, then don’t miss the opportunity that Bitcoin presents. Since the start of our current trading bootcamp, we have already reaped substantial profits in the crypto market. This morning, I suggested going long on Bitcoin around $67,500, targeting $69,000. So far, we’ve made a profit of $800. Assuming you have $10,000 in capital, used just 10% for trading with 100x leverage, today’s earnings would have reached $8,000. This is the allure of the crypto market.

Yesterday’s gains were even more remarkable, and this is the result everyone witnessed firsthand.
